Legendary Origin: The first monarch

According to common folklore among the Isneum, their first king, Areum, found his people besieged by a terrible monster which wore the guise of a terribly scarred bear. The bear attacked and killed without mercy, and regular weapons failed to truly hurt the beast. In his hour of twilight, a tiger appeared in Areum's chambers. Yet instead of the beast killing him, it spoke and offered him a way to best the dire bear. "I shall aid you", the Tiger spoke, "if you make me your bride."

Dumbfounded at first, yet quickly understanding the situation, Areum agreed. The Tiger turned into a new shape, half woman and half tiger, and swore that the beast would find its death before the next new moon.

Together, they created a plan. With the tigress serving as bait they lured the dire bear to the nest of a terrible bird creature with feathers as hard as steel. Areum used his skills as alchemist to throw a certain scent onto the bear, which made it irresistable prey to the bird monster.

After its death, Areum kept his promise. He bade the tigress to remain in a cave for 100 nights, having her drink only special herbal infusions he prepared himself. On the morning of the 101st day, she emerged from the cave as a healthy woman, a tigress no more, and he married her as the sun reached its zenith that very day. As the final vows were spoken the bird monster flew over the town and dropped a bone of the dire bear before the married couple, which they saw as a wedding gift/blessing (which bone is often argued over by scholars).

Areum vowed to protect all of his people from any threat in the future and thus became the first king of Asatta (which back then was called Areumje), and his wife Ar-Harangi the first queen. Bears became symbols of strength, endurance but also terror while the bird monster, later known to Witchers as Rarasha, became a holy symbol of fearsome strength that needed to be respected. It also became the first symbol upon their national emblem.
